

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

A method for operating a compression-ignition internal combustion engine includes metering in a quantity of fuel as a function of an operating point of the engine during a working cycle, and injecting the quantity of fuel which is metered in into the combustion chamber in such a manner that a combustion center of gravity is positioned at a defined crank angle position independently of the operating point of the internal combustion engine.